I chose this image from American Association of School Librarians because it represents the needed collaboration among school employees to improve their students’ academic achievement. Most importantly, this model shows that this outcome can only be achieved if principals recognize the importance of librarians’ involvement with teachers in designing the curriculum. Copyright Information: Montiel, P. (2005). Evaluation: At first, I thought that I could not find any articles discussing school libraries and student learning because both facets had not been combined. However, once combining these facets, I still could not find anything that pertained to what I was looking for. Project Muse interface is user-friendly, but I simply could not find anything that I was looking for. The St. Joseph County Public Library teams up with the University of Notre Dame to improve library services to students and faculty. “We Need Diverse Books” Campaign Gaining Momentum. If you work with children’s books and go online, there’s no way you can miss the colorful logo of the “We Need Diverse Books” (WNDB) campaign, which launched in 2014. Work Smarter: Collaborating and Sharing Resources with School Libraries. During a time of budget cuts and stretched finances, partnerships can be a great way to do more with less. One of the best collaborations public libraries can make is with their local school libraries. By discussing community needs and sharing resources, both libraries will profit immensely. When school and public library staff collaborate to meet the needs of youth, they can increase the impact of their efforts manyfold. By building a seamless bridge for lifelong learning between school and public libraries, both can work together to help the young people and families in their communities achieve their life goals. How can librarians work in collaboration to improve their work to the
